1. At a secret meeting of the Central Committee of the Alianza Popular (Popular Alliance), a Communist-front political party in Guayaquil, Pedro Saad outlined future plans for the organization. The plans included placing two more Party members on the city council and running a candidate for mayor in the next elections. Saad was confident that it would be possible to win at least two more seats on the city council, especially if public apathy were similar to that of the last elections, and he added that even if the Alianza failed to elect a mayor, it would still control the city council by winning the two additional seats.
2. Until the Alianza is able to secure a majority, its representatives on the council have been instructed to attack the interests of American companies in the Guayaquil area and to block any legislation proposed by either the Liberals or Conservatives.
